ARTILLERY IS LOOKING FOR A WEAK SPOT

AMERICANS LEFT ALONE

Despite Losses from Americans of Position, Germans Not Seeking Recapture It.

AFTERNOON SUMMARY, June 28.—There are no outward indications as to the time and place where the next German blow will be aimed. The German artillery is violent South of Arras and South of Aisne. Possibly the Germans may strike there.

LAST NIGHT'S SUMMARY.—With the return to almost normal conditions on the Italian front, there were no indications that the Italians intend to launch another offensive in the immediate future.

Interest now centers on the Western front, where the resumption of an offensive is imminent. The Germans are trying out with their artillery the stability of the French and British positions in the various sectors from Flanders to the Marne river.

The Germans, apparently, have become resigned to the loss of Belleau Wood to the Americans, an important position northwest of Chateau Thierry, as no counter attacks, notwithstanding their heavy daily losses in dead and prisoners, have been made in an endeavor to regain the lost ground.

In addition to killing and wounding many of the enemy in their latest raid, the Americans took 311 prisoners, eleven machine guns, ten automatic rifles, and large quantities of ammunition and other stores when the wood was stormed and the Germans driven from their strong positions.
